"POLICEMAN" That Arrests Lightning Strokes

A STROKE of lightning is no respecter of persons but, at times, seems to take especial delight in hitting electrical "high line" wires. For many years just an ordinary lightning storm could throw a large part of an electrical system out of commission. Engineers employed by private business yearned for "policeman" who would make lightning behave itself,

So they began studying and experimenting, and asking their employers for expense money with which to carry on their research. The money was willingly furnished. The result is the modern lightning arrester such as used on Alabama Power Company electrical transmission and distribution systems. It acts as a "policeman" that directs the lightning stroke into the ground where it is harmless, and so helps protect your electric service against many interruptions during the summer months.

This "policeman" is not yet infallible - occ lightning stroke too strong for him to handle hits a line, but due to other protective devices, the interruption affects only a limited section; and within a few minutes a line crew is on the job making repairs, often so speedily that you don't even know the power is off. Lightning arresters are only one of the many pieces of costly equipment which private industry, without benefit of subsidy or "ballyhoo," has developed to make electric service not only dependable, but also cheap.
